BOGO Fall Content

1 This weekend, every drink is buy one get one free. Bring someone, split the tab, spend the extra ten minutes outside instead of in line. Three days, no exceptions, no fine print to read first.

2 Buy one, get one free, three days straight. It's a small thing, a second cup for whoever you bring, but it adds up to the actual point: get outside with someone instead of alone. That's the whole campaign, nothing else attached.

3 Free doesn't mean lesser. This weekend, bring a friend and the second drink is on us, same ingredients as the first. Three days, then it's back to normal. Come see who shows up when the invite's just "get outside."

Those three follow the pattern: open on the fact, not a hook, close plain, no stacked punctuation, no banned words.

4 BOGO ALERT!!! Treat yourself and a friend to some guilt-free vibes this weekend — don't miss out on this INCREDIBLE deal!!! Get outside, touch grass, and enjoy every sip! 🌿 ✨

5 At Groundswell, we believe self-care starts with a great deal. Our BOGO weekend is here — because you deserve it! Buy one, get one free and treat yourself to fresh, delicious juice while soaking up nature. Don't wait, this offer won't last!

Post 4 breaks it with stacked exclamation points, emoji, an em dash, and two banned words in one line ("treat yourself," "guilt-free"). Post 5 adds "self-care" as a hook and "you deserve it," which is the self-congratulatory, hype-driven tone the brand voice guide flags directly — plus a scarcity line ("won't last") the real brand never uses since nothing about a three-day weekend is actually scarce.
